By using two flashpoints in East Asia--the Korean peninsula and the Taiwan Strait, this paper develops a notion on co-management as a new security framework. This co-management approach focuses on how major powers, including China, Japan, the United States, and Russia, have moved to a co-management mode to prevent potential international crises, namely military confrontation among major powers. This new development has been more relevant to the relations among two leading powers, namely the United States and China.
